Unlike many other large corporate entities, Hyperdyne combines its corporate offices and design and production facilities into a single campus. The entry to the complex is bracketed by two small, multi-level buildings that straddle the main road serving Hyperdyne. These structures house offices and meeting rooms for visitors, as well as the command center for Hyperdyne's security forces. The two main structures that flank the north and south sides of a large open courtyard house the main research and design departments of Hyperdyne. They are connected by a smaller structure that crosses the inner courtyard and serves as a component testing center. The north side of the complex features a high-rise office building that directly overlooks the twin low-rise design and research buildings. The eastern half of the complex is given over to a far more utilitarian structure that is home to Hyperdyne's primary manufacturing complex. This structure rises to nearly half the height of the office structure above ground, but features an additional one hundred levels below ground to contain the entirety of Hyperdyne's manufacturing capacity. The entire complex stretches 5.6 km from east to west and nearly 1.6 km from north to south.

The complex itself is protected by a highly sophisticated, layered security system. Anti-repulsor fields and powered barriers line the perimeter of the property, with all entry points guarded by security personnel requiring security clearances for entry. The only publicly accessible portion of the Hyperdyne property are the two entry buildings at the western entry.

These apartment style structures are given over to housing the workers and client employees of Hyperdyne, in this case mostly those who are employed inside the company's manufacturing complex. Most of these workers are predominantly humans drawn from the local population, but there is a small but diverse section of housing catering to non-human workers from other worlds.

The complex itself was built with heavy subsidies and tax exemptions from the Cadinth Oligarchy government. This has lead many to believe that these easements were given because many of Hyperdyne's senior board members are also members of the Cadinth Oligarchy itself. Since it's construction, the government has continued its lax application of local planetary ordinances to the facility, especially those regarding upkeep and maintenance of the companies worker housing.
