

“What lurks beneath these sands? Creatures of myth and legends.”~ Unknown Scientist

Datapad Entry one: The Skitterer of the Tombs

The ancient Sith tombs on Morraband have many tales to tell and horrific, yet deadly creatures that lurk beneath the sands. One such creature encountered by one of the groups was nicknamed ‘The Skitterer’.

The Skitterer was a rather large creature with several legs attached to a well toned muscular body that stands at 2.4 meters. The creature itself is covered with a rough chitin-like outer armor that is very difficult to pierce with regular blaster pistols.

Also decorated along its body are several sharp venomous spikes that if touched cause instant pain to the victim. If that wasn’t bad enough the creature also spits out some form of concentrated acid that will eat the face off whatever organic thing it comes into contact with.

The face of the creature is rather horrendous with a large gaping maw that has several rows of sharp teeth and terrifying mandibles at the sides of the mouth that seek to tear up flesh. Its eyes are lizard-like with red slits that are on a small stalk that can move in just about any direction it chooses.

Besides using sight, this creature also seems to hunt by heat signatures as when it scans about a small piece of its armor opens up on the right side of its head, revealing some small black round object that spins about. Once it detects a heat signature, the unfortunate victim is suddenly charged and grabbed by 4 of its 20 leg appendages. Afterwards, the creature either spits acid to dissolve the victim or simply uses its teeth and mandibles to tear them apart.

Overall, this is not a creature I recommend anyone trying to face by themselves.