

Raid

Meridian Cargo Hold After Dismantle of Defenses

Rulvak was ready for this. The Sephi had spent hours formulating a plan while being jostled around in his chambers from the impact from the Meridian's defenses and listening to the thuds of the shields absorbing them all the same. He knew then that his plan was sound, especially after studying the stations layout and working with their port guys to identify which markers would yield the best results from a quick looting of the Meridian. This made him confident when he was navigating his way to the Cargo Hold, and he's ready to execute the mission now that he is here.

There should be plenty of goodies in here, Rulvak thought to himself as he skimmed the surrounding cargo hold for any stand-out markers. Even with the alarms blaring, lights flashing, and an automatic emergency message from their space engagement dismantling their defense array, he found what he was searching for quite quickly; hazardous markers. Rulvak moved towards the cargo containers with haste and caution, intentionally diverting from the main path to avoid any line-of-sight areas that might capture his movements from the security office or cameras. Even though they had successfully infiltrated the Meridian, he didn't want to alert any remaining enemies to his ulterior goals. Upon reaching his destination, he found exactly what they were expecting...and more.

His comm device chirped, "Rulvak, have you found what we're looking for? We could really use those weapons and munitions now!" His team lead, Larez, spoke quickly as the sound of blaster-fire came over the comms.

"Sir, we have it, and there's something else."

"What is--" an explosion overruling the directors next few words.

"Sir? Do you require my assist--" Rulvak began, beginning to think that he may have left them short-handed.

"Rulvak, don't worry about us. Tell me what you found!"

"Sir, I've found an entire container full of advanced technological body modifications, and another few cargo containers to supply a good portion of our fleet."

"Nice job Rulvak, we'll be down there to help you haul it out. Secure the area! Echo one, out."

The Battlelord was used to doing things himself, so this was an easy task for him. He turned away from the containers, and began focusing his mind to search for any enemies that may be within the bay with him. It wasn't long before he found that he was not alone. He started towards the other person within the bay, ready to fulfil his order to secure.

It didn't take long for Rulvak to reach the other side of the bay where a group of slaves sat within a few cages. All of them began to cry out pleading for the Sephi to set them free. They were obviously part of the cargo, but they were not who he was searching for. The slaves were clouding his senses. Rulvak could sense that the enemy was close, but was unable to pinpoint where.

Rulvak jumped back as his body reacted preemptively to a vibrosword slashing through the air where he had been standing. The gasps of the slaves followed by more crying out to save them did not distract him at all. He bent down, then lept unnaturally on top of a few stacked cargo containers. He found his adversary quickly as she started to dash towards another set of containers. Before she could make it, they dropped to their knees, and began to cry out, "No please, anything but that! Don't throw me out of the airlock...please!"

Rulvak began to descend the containers, hopping down one set at a time as he maintained his concentration on the mind trick that was targeting his foe. Upon reaching her, he quickly subdued her with restraints and released his mind trick. There was bewilderment in her eyes as they darted to and fro, searching for an explanation as to where she was and how she got there. Her eyes finally met Rulvak, and a scowl came across her face.

"No wonder you didn't have back up. Filthy Sith." She spat at the Battlelord, who kept his composure.

"Larez will love to know why you're down here, and what information you have. Thank you for making it easy for me." Rulvak smirked, knowing that they had just found their answer to quickly finding everything they wanted within the cargo bay.