Prompt: Disagreement

"You can't act like that in public!" TuQ'uan yelled across the small room.

"Whys not?" Derry shrugged.

"Because you can't just punch people in the face when you disagree with them."

"Evens when their askings for it?"

"Did he outright say, 'please sir, you like a strong young man who likes to hit things for no reason. Would you be so kind as to punch me in the face?!' The Kel Dor eventuates the last few word by poking his finger into the large Chiss chest in front of him.

"Wells...nots in so many words."

"Then how did he ask for it?"

"Well, he didn'ts really asks for it worth his words. But his face was askings for it."

"So let me get this straight, you punched a man. In public. Because he was asking for it. But he never said anything about fighting you, except with his face, which was asking to get punched. Is that about right?"

"Well, yeahs."

"So you punched a man because you didn't like his face," TuQ'uan sighed.

"Well, I means there was a lot more to it than thats." Derry's eyes dropped to the floor.

"Please, explain it to me then."

"Well, ya sees I was looking at a new pairs of gloves when he started looking at mes and judging mes. And ya knows how I don't liked to be judged. Wells anyway, I knew he was thinkings that I was shoplifting, I coulds see it in his eyes. Sos to teach hims a lesson, I hit him."

"So not only did you punch a man in the face, in his own store, but you did it to teach him a lesson about judging people before they act. Which in turn means you acted just like he thought you would," TuQ'uan's voice had taken on an exasperated tone. "Look, we'll talk about this more later. The reason I called you in here is that I need you to punch someone in the face for me...”
