

Presumption:

"The destruction of the Empire was positive for the galaxy as a whole."

Debate position: Affirmative

When the Empire rose from the Republic at the end of the Clone Wars, only the littlest people realized what was about to unfold. The majority instead was blinded by the charisma of the High Chancellor who had self elected himself into the position of Emperor, though unknowing that it wasn't only sweet words that made the masses follow.

A man who while there was still a working democracy had outright bend any and all laws of said Republic to ensure himself to stay in a position of power for as long as possible, a first prove of the lust for power and greed that will spread out within the ranks of the empire like a disease.

Corruption became a state of affairs and those that were particularly skilled in exploiting and turning the weaknesses of others easily found themselves in a superior position. From this position, those of power in the empire actively discriminated everyone with a different opinion or became a threat to their position of power. For this reason, the destruction of the Empire was positive for the galaxy as a whole.

Before the Empire there was a working democracy, a government that while not able to solve a problem immediately, it solved the problems with the intent to solve it for the benefit of the majority of its citizens. With the destruction of the Empire and its ill befallen dictatorship, a new Republic, a new democracy has been called out. A democracy like the one before the Empire where the decisions that were made, were again made for the benefit of the majority. A democracy where the people that were discriminated again received a voice to make a change. A democracy where never again a person of power could miss-use his position for his or her own advantage. For this reason: The destruction of the Empire was positive for the galaxy as a whole.