

Temnos: Section 12-A

Author: Morgan B. Sorenn

The Temnos mining facility has seen major fighting during the Thirteenth Great Jedi War. Some of it has left parts of the facility damaged and scorched with massed laser fire from orbiting ships or defense batteries turned on the facility itself. More than that, internal sabotage and explosions have left whole sections isolated from the main hangars and refinery. Section 12-A is but one of these damaged areas.

Located on the southernmost edge of the mining facility, Section 12-A is a designated communal area where workers used to live between shifts. Composed of four habitation blocks each with forty bunks, and a main communal area for entertainment and socializing, the section has since been reduced to rubble. Much of its infrastructure now damaged from the fighting, in particular, the main double corridors leading north, into the rest of the facility, have been sabotaged with improvised explosives, leaving only energy fields to keep the atmosphere in Section 12-A from escaping into the vacuum of space. The one and only functional airlock that remains, the one between the two main corridors in the communal area, is sealed and accessible through brute force or clever decoding.

Lights flicker throughout the area, clearly already on emergency power, giving the whole section an eerie glow and atmosphere. Electrical cabling hangs dangerously from damaged ceilings, while circuit boards and ruined databanks spark furiously presenting a major fire hazard. Alarm lights and horns blaze across every wall, warning of imminent power loss or some other equally deadly hazard, as the energy fields fail periodically, creating strong gusts of air through the Section before other areas can be automatically shielded to prevent further decompression. Heavy ferrocete ceiling panels, rocked out of place by explosions, periodically fall from their cradles with every new decompression only adding to the dangers of Section 12-A.