

It is a small, non-descript building. On outward appearances, there is nothing peculiar about it at all. It stands at about 5 metres in height with a flat roof. It is clad in the timber of a local tree that in the moonlight makes the building glow a soft fluorescent blue. To one side of the building is a small timber door with an old style handle to open and close it. If this building were in the centre of a city, no one would ever give it a second glance, but this building is nestled deep in a woodland. So deep in fact that unless you are within several metres of it, you would never see it from above. The roof also has some kind of shielding protecting it from electromagnetic detection. A small landing pad sits beside the house. Its ferrocrete floor has a diameter of only 10 metres and is not meant for heavy vessels. When standing on the landing pad, you can see another door made with the same material as the front door. There are no other entrances or exits, nor are there any windows. Knocking on the front door, a small cap retracts revealing the droid servant responsible for authorised persons accessing this secret facility.