

Well, I can't defeat him in hand-to-hand combat, due to his knowledge of Mandalorian Core, so I would opt for a more ranged attack while using the Force to wear him down, slowing his attacks and forcing him to use more energy. I would also use precognition to detect any retaliation, causing him to waste blaster shots as well. Once he was tired and drained, I would incapacitate him with the Force.

He would most likely, not being a Force-user, try to take me down in either hand-to-hand or ranged combat. I wouldn't stand a chance against his knowledge of many martial arts styles, and he is a crack shot with a blaster. He might attempt to use a poisoned weapon against me, either to disable or kill me.

The fight would start out slow, each of us testing the other's defense. Suddenly he might feint a shot toward my head, while firing quick shots toward my chest. I would dodge quickly out of the way, and use a mind trick to confuse him. He would quickly shake off the disorientation and retaliate with a thrown smoke bomb, meant to hide his approach. I would push it toward him with the Force, and he would be engulfed in smoke as I continued to attempt to mind trick him. He would utilize his jetpack to fly up out of the smoke, and he would squeeze off several shots at me. I would avoid most of them with ease, but I would need my lightsaber to deflect a few. The fight would end, eventually, with him as the victor, due to his use of his jetpack to get in close range to me, where he could use Mandalorian Core to overpower me.